The Robbers Roost

Reprinted From February 2012 Newsletter

Sandwiched between the Colorado River, Green River and Dirty Devil River is a savage stretch of land crisscrossing with steep-walled canyons and hidden ravines. For thirty-years this inhospitable terrain served as a hide out for the outlaws of every sort. Robbers Roost was a strong hold of the Wild Bunch, Butch Cassidy's motley band of bank robbers, trained stick up men, and horse and cattle rustlers.

The area received its colorful name and reputation in the 1870's when Cap Brown ran stolen horses through the area. Robbers Roost afforded hundreds of hiding spots and was difficult to penetrate. A Circleville, Utah native and grandson of a Mormon handcart pioneer named Robert Leroy Parker, better known by his alias Butch Cassidy, began using the roost in 1880's to hide cattle that he rustled.

Robbers Roost was one of several hideouts along what became as the out-law trail Browns Hole, a rugged canyon region near the junction of Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming on the Green River, was another such hideout along with the hole-in-the-rock in south-central Wyoming. The three hideouts are strung out in an approximate North-South direction and are about 200 miles apart as the crow flies. These hideouts served as temporary refuges and semi-permanent wild bunch headquarters in the 1880's, 90's and early 1900's.

Another frequent resident of the Roost territory was Matt Warner, born Willard E. Christensen to the fifth wife of a Mormon bishop in Ephraim, Utah. Warner served a cattle-rustling apprenticeship before joining the McCarthy gang along with Cassidy. The future Wild Bunch used Robbers Roost after a Colorado bank robbery in 1889. Member of the Wild Bunch used it again in April 1897 after they help up the Pleasant Valley Coal Company payroll. During robberies such as these made the Wild Bunch notorious to some and folk heroes to others. Their hard rides between the strings of hideouts were equally impressive.

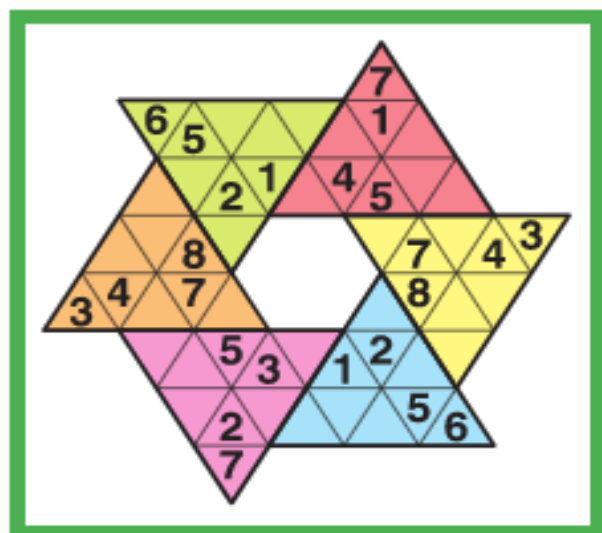

The outlaws were all expert horsemen and always stressed the importance of strong, well-trained horses, often changing mounts at the various hideouts along the outlaw trail.
